Gov. Holcomb announces stages of reopening plan

Thank you.

Hoosiers 65 and over and those with high-risk health conditions – who are the most vulnerable to the coronavirus – should remain at home. Essential travel restrictions are lifted, and social gatherings of up to 25 people are permitted following the CDC's social distancing guidelines. Charley Creek Inn celebrates its 100th anniversary despite virus

'Georgian Revival gem' opened its doors May 6, 1920 as Hotel Indiana

In honor of Charley Creek Inn's centennial, several festivities were planned including a First Friday Centennial Celebration and Miami Street Block party, but due to the global coronavirus pandemic, they have been postponed until the pandemic subsides, according to Howard Kaler, general manager.

"While we are honored to celebrate our centennial, our top priority is to maintain the health and safety of our staff, guests, and community members throughout this unprecedented global pandemic. Although it's important to take a moment to think about our history until such time authorities allow us to return to our normal operating schedule, we are postponing our 100th Anniversary festivities," stated general Kaler.

Pandemic causes crunch in the restaurant, hospitality industry

The COVID-19 pandemic has wreaked havoc on many industries, and the restaurant and hospitality industries have been among the hardest

In response to a Plain Dealer request on Thursday, Kari Highley, director of marketing and sales, stated carry-out wasn't viable financially for Charley Creek Inn.

"So, regretfully, we had to lay off our food and beverage staff. As the state slowly begins to open, we are faced not only with training staff on heightened sanitary measures and new procedures but also with the impact of seating capacity cut to 50 percent," stated Highley. "New regulations will https://res.windsurfercrs.com/ibe/

Highley stated travel restrictions have also burdened the hotel with weddings-related events, graduation celebrations, business meetings, church retreats, class reunions and family reunions canceling through August. "Therefore, revenue throughout the entire operation – guest rooms, food, beverage and shoppes - has taken a major hit. We value our relationship with our community, guests, and staff, and thank you for placing your trust in Charley Creek Inn. We are committed to staying connected with you as we all navigate these unprecedented times," stated Highley.

Highley stated customers who wish to support the Charley Creek Inn during this unprecedented time may:

"After falling into disrepair throughout many lively decades, the gracious hotel obtained a new lease on life in 2007, when local philanthropist and historic preservation aficionado Richard E. Ford, of the Ford Meter Box family, bought the building and renovated it to perfection," stated Kaler.

On Friday, Gov. Eric J. Holcomb signed Executive Order 20-27 to further extend the Bureau of Motor Vehicles (BMV) renewal deadlines, according to Rachel Hoffmeyer, press secretary.

Driver's licenses, identification cards and vehicle registrations that expire before June 4 will now be valid through

Additionally, the executive order provides an extension to June 4 for anyone who has an expiring state-issued profes-

If cash is king right now because of the coronavirus, so, too, is being mortgage-free

s the stock market sky-A rocketed and mortgage interest rates fell, financial experts encouraged people to put any extra money they had into their retirement accounts rather than pay off their mortgages early.

The reasoning behind such advice was twofold. Homeowners could potentially earn more by investing extra funds in the bull market than they saved by paying down their mortgage. And however much they spent on mortgage interest, they'd get some of the money back at tax time.

I've never been a fan of this advice, for a few

■ Stocks have more risk. Unlike the stock market, paying off your mortgage early offers a guaranteed return. Shorten your mortgage by paying it down sooner, and you pay less in mortgage interest.

And, as we've seen since the coronavirus began spreading, the stock market can be extremely volatile as investors respond to economic downturns by fleeing to safer investments. Over time, investors have historically seen positive returns, but in any given period, that's not a guarantee. We are in one of those uncertain periods now.

■ The mortgage interest deduction isn't as significant as you think. Keep in mind that this tax break is a deduction, not a credit. A tax credit reduces, dollar for dollar, the taxes you owe. A deduction eliminates only a percentage of your income subject to taxation.

The vast majority of homeowners don't claim the mortgage interest deduction at all: They take the standard deduction rather than itemizing. You have to itemize on your return to take the mortgage interest deduction.

The number of homeowners who benefit from the mortgage tax break plummeted following the passage of the 2017 Tax Cuts and Jobs Act, which nearly doubled the standard deduction, with the result that fewer taxpayers itemized deductions on their tax returns. The tax law reduced the share of taxpayers claiming the mortgage-interest deduction from 23 percent to 11 percent, according to the Institute on Taxation and Economic Policy.

■ There's value in not worrying about the roof over your head. If you're a homeowner, you can weather a financial storm a lot longer if your housing expense is confined to a manageable property tax bill and a homeowner's insurance premium.

"It's been a great feeling ever since we went to the bank to make the very last payment," a North Carolina reader wrote. "Right now we feel incredibly fortunate that we don't have any monetary stress and know that if something happens to our – or even one of our - jobs, we'll be OK."

With unemployment up and tens of millions of folks out of work, I wanted to revisit the debate about paying off a mortgage early with financial adviser Ric Edelman. We've had many long and friendly discussions about this issue.

I asked Edelman recently if he had changed his mind given current economic conditions. He doubled down arguing that it's still better for people to invest extra funds rather than tying up the cash in a home, creating a situation referred to as being "house rich, cash poor."

"None of that money is helping you pay your bills. I have all this money in investments, readily available, liquid and accessible," he said. "You know: You're house rich. I'm investment

It's true that when a crisis hits and you lose your job, you'll need cash, and you may not be able to access the equity in your home.

"I just refinanced our house to a 30-year fixed rate at 2.875 percent," Edelman said. "Now, why wouldn't I want to keep that mortgage for as long as I can? I'm going to take the thousands of dollars in savings from the lower payments and throw it into investments.'

To Edelman's point, here are some things to consider before paying off your mortgage early.

■ Do you have high-interest debt? If so, tackle this first before you make extra principle payments on your mortgage.

■ Do you have an adequate emergency fund? "The problem is that there are some people who have only paid off their mortgage right to the point where they have nothing left," he said. "They have no cash because they've diverted every dollar to getting rid of the loan. And today, they're out of work with no income and no savings or investments, but they have a ton of home equity. Well, that's not putting food on their table."

Edelman's right. But, I'm right, too.

So, don't cripple your cash reserves on a quest to be mortgage-free. But if you can save, invest and get rid of your mortgage when an economic storm hits, you'll be in a better position to ride it out.

You're correct that it's about food freshness and safety. Older adults are at increased risk of hospitalization, and even death, due to food-borne illness. You mentioned your father's handling of prepared foods, like baked chicken, as well as staples like eggs and bacon. It's helpful to know that the sell-by dates on packaged foods refer to food quality rather than food safety. Eggs that remain refrigerated are safe to use for up to three weeks beyond the sell-by date. A package of bacon can be kept refrigerated for up to a week beyond the sell-by date. With prepared foods, the however. window becomes much smaller. When refrigerated properly, cooked chicken will last for three to four days. After that, it's not safe and should be thrown away.

-- A reader from Omaha, Nebraska, wondered about health benefits attributed to a few teaspoonfuls of apple cider vinegar per day. It's an age-old folk remedy, and while many of the claims are far-fetched no, you can't replace blood pressure meds with apple cider vinegar - there is some evidence that it can be helpful. For instance, studies have shown that apple cider vinegar may play a modest role in control of blood sugar. It may also aid in weight loss by suppressing appetite. How-the wrong bank account. A man received a $1,200 payment for his sister who died last year, and he's not sure whether he can keep the money or if the IRS will claw it back. The Coronavirus Aid, Relief, and Economic Security (Cares) Act, signed into law March 27, provides a $1,200 refundable tax credit for individuals and $2,400 for joint taxpayers. People whose adjusted gross income qualifies them to receive a stimulus payment are supposed to receive an additional $500 for every dependent child under 17. The Treasury Department and the IRS reported last week that an initial 88.1 million payments worth nearly $158 billion had been issued.

But the rush to get money to tens of millions of people has resulted in payment errors – like the examples

The Cares Act set out a way for people to verify that they received the right amount and seek help to resolve problems with their stimulus payments. The law says a letter should be mailed to a taxpayer's last known address 15 days after a stimulus payment is sent. The letter is supposed to indicate the method by which a payment was made (direct deposit or check, for instance), the amount of the payment and a phone number for the "appropriate point of contact" at the Internal Revenue Service to report any issue. It's now been 15 days people were sent stimulus money, and per the law, the IRS began mailing letters to payment recipients.

However, what should have been an instructive letter coming from either the Treasury or the IRS reads more like a message that the Trump reelection campaign would send out to voters.

"Just as we have before, America will triumph yet again – and rise to new heights of greatness," the letter says.

This language is just another way of restating Trump's 2016 campaign slogan, "Make America Great Again," or the president's 2020 rallying cry, "Keep America Great."

Although Trump thanks Congress for passing the Cares Act, he strategically leads into the information about the stimulus payment by beginning, "I am pleased to notify you ...

Readers are complaining that the letter is highly inappropriate. While the envelope reads Treasury Department and the IRS, once it has been opened, the letterhead says, "The White House." The Treasury didn't immediately respond to questions about the complaints.

"Worried that I had been selected for an audit, or some other misfortune, I quickly opened it," Chris Helmsworth emailed from Portland, Oregon. "Inside was a letter from the White House, signed with Trump's childlike scrawl, telling me about how he was bringing the country together! I have to wonder how much personal protective equipment could have been purchased with what it cost for Trump to send out this vanity letter."

It's worth noting that President George W. Bush included his name in letters about economic stimulus payments in 2008. But the mention was brief, and those letters – sent by the on how payments were determined. There were far more details from which people could figure out for themselves whether their payments were correct. The recent economic impact letter signed by Trump offers scant information about the stimulus payments.

Keep focus on coronavirus, not on China

Beyond the most profound health impacts worldwide – including in Minnesota, which on Thursday reported its 508th COVID-19 fatality - the coronavirus pandemic has infected economics and geopolitics to crisis levels, too.

It's imperative to mitigate the damage while the world waits for a vaccine that can end this scourge. But that will be more difficult, and thus deadly, if China and America devolve deeper toward a U.S.-U.S.S.R.-style Cold War.

"This is the most perilous moment since World War II," Ryan Hass, a fellow at the Brookings Institution's China Center, told an editorial writer. "This is the most acute public-health crisis that the world has faced in a century. It's hitting every major country simultaneously. The ability of world powers to collaborate is severely diminished; multilateral institutions like the World Health Organization, the U.N., the G-7, the G-20 just aren't functional."

The injuries these institutions have endured is due in part to hostility from Washington, where President Donald Trump has undermined confidence and cooperation in postwar entities meant to guide and galvanize the world through a crisis. If these multinational organizations cannot curb the virus, efforts must be led by Beijing and Washington. But at the moment,

Hass notes, "the U.S.-China relationship is in free fall and there doesn't appear to be any effort in Beijing and Washington to preserve its capacity to collaborate in arresting the spread of the virus or destruction that it is causing.'

Instead, Hass continued, "those countries are trying to place the other in the worst possible light on the international stage.'

The motivation is domestic politics for President Donald Trump and Chinese President Xi Jinping. Xi may not face a November election but is suddenly vulnerable despite previous veneration of his leadership that made him China's most powerful leader since Mao.

Trump, as well as Secretary of State Mike Pompeo, have alleged – without evidence – that the virus emerged from a lab in Wuhan and not naturally through animal-to-human transmission, as most experts believe. There's also talk among some supporters of the administration about pressing for reparations, or even not paying some of the debt the U.S. owes China.

These moves have alienated allies – including those who rightfully take umbrage at Beijing's manipulative extraction of praise in exchange for desperately needed equipment. Instead, the president should be rallying allies, and indeed the world, in a coordinated coronavirus effort as well as in a longer-term response to a rising China.

For China, "trying to impose its narrative of the coronavirus both internationally but more importantly domestically is important for the leadership to rehabilitate and consolidate its position and legitimacy in the system," Hung Tran, a nonresident senior fellow at the Atlantic Council, told an editorial writer. He added that it may also embolden China to take a more dangerous stance toward Taiwan, an overreliance on China for Hong Kong and its maritime claims in the South China Sea.

Xi's geopolitical push is also about "trying to generate more widespread support among Chinese for how quickly and efficiently and presumably effectively the Chinese have come out of this while the rest of the world, especially America, can't seem to control the virus," Evan Medeiros, the chair of Asian Studies at Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service, told an editorial writer. As for Trump, Medeiros said, "this is largely for him a recognition that blaming China deflects responsibility from the cascade of shortcomings within the United States.'

China clearly deserves some blame. Wuhan was the epicenter, regardless of how the virus originated, and the Chinese Communist Party suppressed the information that could have helped contain COVID-19 to a regional outbreak, not a global pandemic that's breaking the world's economy, and order.

On a longer-term basis, Beijing has a horrific human rights record toward Tibetans, Uighurs and others. It's also the world's biggest jailer of journalists, it threatens neighboring nations with its territorial aggression, and it makes a practice of illegitimate, if not illegal, trade practices.

These, and other issues like essential materials, will need to be strategically assessed by the U.S. and its allies regardless of who wins November's election. But for now the literal life-or-death imperative is the pandemic.

"The only way to make the United States safe is to stamp out the virus in every corner of the world," Hass said. "The only way to stamp out the virus in every corner of the world is to align international efforts to do so, and there's no pathway to doing that without China on board. And so it's time to tone down the rhetoric, take a break from the finger pointing, and roll up our sleeves and figure out how to get our arms around the

"The American people," Hass rightfully concluded, "deserve problem.

This editorial was first published in the Star-Tribune.

This isn't good for anyone

It is time to ask once again, in all seriousness, whether the president of the United States is of sound mind.

Even by his own standards, President Trump's recent ranting and raving on Twitter was bizarre and disturbing. I know there are commentators who see his eruptions as some kind of genius-level communications strategy, a way of bonding himself to his loyal base by sending messages at dog-whistle frequencies others cannot hear. Others justify these tantrums as a way for an embattled president to blow off steam. But there is a simpler and more disturbing interpretation: What you see is what you get.

And what we got was a whole lot of crazy. It's not good for the country, and it doesn't seem very good for the president,

The president opened the floodgates holding back a reservoir of grievance on Sunday afternoon with the claim that "people that know me and know the history of our Country say that I am the hardest working President in history." Over the course of three tweets, it emerged that he was angry about an article in the New York Times – a paper he claims not to read - questioning his work ethic during the pandemic.

Then things got really weird. In his next barrage of tweets, Trump demanded to know: "When will all of the 'reporters' who have received Noble Prizes for their work on Russia, Russia, Russia, only to have been proven totally wrong (and, in fact, it was the other side who committed the crimes), be turning back their cherished 'Nobles' so that they can be given to the REAL REPORTERS AND JOUR-NALISTS who got it right?... When will the Noble Committee Act?"

Where to begin? Could the president really have intended to refer to "Nobel" prizes and simply misspelled the name? And since there is no Nobel awarded for journalism, could he have been thinking of the Pulitzer Prize won by journalists, including those at The Post, for their work covering Russian interference in the 2016 election?

Those who see Trump as a brilliant communicator might think the garble was deliberate, an invitation to snooty know-it-alls to jump all over him so he could portray himself to his aggrieved base as a victim of fake-news "elites." But this view is inconsistent with what happened later in the day.

Trump tweeted a purported explanation: "Does anybody get the meaning of what a so-called Noble (not Nobel) Prize is, especially as it pertains to Reporters and Journalists? Noble is defined as, 'having or showing fine personal qualities or high moral principles and ideals.' Does sarcasm ever work?"

"Sarcasm" is becoming a familiar claim from the president. After speculating nonsensically last week at a coronavirus briefing that disinfectants or powerful light could be used "inside the body" to combat COVID-19, and being widely ridiculed for the suggestion, Trump claimed he was just being sarcastic. But it's not much of a defense when Trump invokes it while also trying to make the comments he is justifying disappear. At some point overnight, the earlier "Noble Prize" tweets vanished from Trump's feed (though not before journalists had archived them).

If these episodes aren't strategy, what are they? If tweeting and retweeting attacks on The Post, CNN, MSNBC and even Fox News calmed Trump, his apologists might argue that they're a form of recreation. But the pressure doesn't seem to be going down. It seems to be mounting.

I'm not making a diagnosis, but rather just stating the obvious. If a loved one were raging in such a manner you'd worry about his or her well-being. You'd hope it was just a bad spell. You might attempt to investigate, if only with a text reading: "R u ok?" We can only hope someone in Trump's life is doing the same for him.

I can understand why Trump would be frustrated, seeing his plan to run for reelection on the strength of the economy ruined. I understand why he might be impatient for things to get back to normal. I'm impatient, too.

But it is objectively worrisome how much time the president spends venting his frustration and impatience. It is worrisome that he seems to engage in magical thinking about a miracle cure that will suddenly make everything better. It is alarming that a man with so little apparent self-control has so much power.

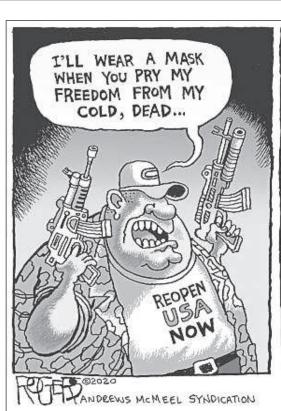

And there's nothing we can do about it until November.

Mother's Day and unmeasured economics

The occasion of Mother's ■ Day demands a column of sentimentality. To my mind, there's nothing better suited to the day than a review of National Income Accounts and Gross Domestic Product. Of course, COVID-19 and its urgent effects upon both will animate this column.

In times like these, economists and many others watch the employment and economic growth numbers. The latter of these is typically the annualized change in Gross Domestic Product over the last quarter. Not surprisingly, these most recent data were ugly, reporting that GDP dropped by 4.8 percent at an annualized rate. That means the measured economy in March was about 1.2 percent lower than in December after adjusting for seasonal differences. But what does this tell us about what is happening in our economy?

The answer is less than we should hope for. Our GDP fails to count most of those things we do at home, for which money is not transacted. As we grow more affluent and can better exploit the division of labor, GDP naturally rises. A century ago, when a much larger share of Americans grew or raised their own food and cooked it, cut one another's hair and made their own clothes, measured GDP per person was much lower. Even accounting for inflation, we have a higher GDP today than a century ago, simply because we count more types of exchange. Obviously, the division of labor

gives us better quality in some aspects of our lives. Barbering is better now than a century ago, as are options for lawn care, medicine or transportation. As Adam Smith explained in 1775, this simple act of getting really good at one task is productivity improving. It grows GDP, not just because we count it, but because we are better at it. Still, we do much at home that is not measured as part of our economy, but failing to measure it does not mean it doesn't happen. Recent events give us just such an example.

There are roughly 330 million Americans who eat three or so meals per day. I have two teenage boys at home, so we average roughly four meals per day. On average, close to one million meals are consumed by Americans each day, with about 20 percent consumed at restaurants. The restaurant industry is about $800 billion in sales, or roughly $200 per month for the average American.

Over the past month and a half, most U.S. restaurants have closed, or serve only carry out. I don't know how many meals are still consumed each week from carry out. Still, it is safe to say that American families are making well over 100 million more meals at home each day than they were two months ago. This has a big impact on measured GDP. We continue to count the value of the groceries that goes into these meals, but that is a small share of it total value. We fail to count the value of the meal preparation in our official statistics. The COVID-19 crisis causes a small but not trivial share of measured GDP to disappear as it is done at home. Meal preparation is the obvious example, but all kinds of other personal services from personal trainers, home cleaning, laundry services, dog walkers, haircuts and the like simply disappear from the official measures. This is not because the services aren't being performed, but because they aren't measured.

Perhaps we should measure these activities better, but I'm not sure how important that really is. The purpose of measuring economic activity is to inform responsive economic policy. We have a pretty good idea of damages right now without measuring the value of home production. Moreover, it is hard enough to make a good accounting of how much I spend at restaurants and personal services. Imagine the difficulty of placing a dollar value me walking my own dog?

What we are more likely to do during this crisis and in the years ahead is to re-evaluate how we individually value these unmeasured parts of GDP. I suspect this will cause us to change how and where we consume goods, not just during this Covid-19 crisis, but long afterwards. One early indicator of that will be meals eaten at home in the months after this crisis recedes. Of course there'll be a big spike in restaurant sales as Americans head to their favorite watering holes and diners. But, after a few weeks, we might see a return to home cooked meals.

Large consumption changes such as this have consequences. Obviously, this would be unwelcome news for restaurants, as well as the local governments who rely on food and beverage taxes. This would also affect grocery stores, and the types of food they buy. Restaurants are better consumers of locally produced food than many groceries, so these changes affect farms and produce providers as well.

These changes also affect families. Meals consumed at home provide more intense family time than many other settings. Some families will find this beneficial, and continue the ritual for that purpose as well. Eating at home is less expensive in measured dollars, but requires labor inputs not measured. I write about these matters in the shadow of Mother's Day. That is appropriate, because a disproportionate share of unmeasured work falls to women, particularly those who happen to have kids.

Maybe this crisis will cause some adjustments in homebound economics. Perhaps we'll have kids who learn to cook or assist at meals, and maybe gain a more enduring appreciation for those skills. Maybe we will see a shift in the gendered division of labor at home. It is likely that more men can work from home than women.

All of these will be interesting develops to watch for and talk about at those meals we spend together. In a generation, when children who are not yet born hear about these times, they will doubtless ask questions about these issues. We will face the same sorts of questions those who lived through the Great Depression or World War II were asked. Whatever else our answers to these questions, I hope that we can all say that we did something to make this a memorable Mother's Day, even if you can't give your mom a

Friendship ends with flood of social media messages

DEAR ABBY: I had this friend that I met eight months ago at a local boxing gym here in Chicago. We got along extremely well and even hung out a couple of times. However, she left her job at the gym two months later and things started falling apart.

I started sending excessive messages on her social media, and she didn't like it. By the following month, she had enough. She told me I have an unhealthy attachment to her and we would go our separate ways. She blocked me from all social media, and she hasn't contacted me since.

Four months later, I am better, but she is still in my head. I really want to write her a nice and sincere letter and reconcile with her and have her be my friend again. I didn't know that I was doing something wrong.

I have tried reaching out to her multiple times recently via email, to no avail. In the meantime, one of her friends told me she has moved to Texas, which makes it even more heartbreaking. How can I show her I can be her friend again without exhibiting those same "toxic" behaviors? - Guy With A Wounded Heart

DEAR GUY: You have already done enough. You have done so much, in fact, that the young woman felt she was being stalked. She has sent you clear signals that she's not interested in being friends - or anything more with you. For your own sake, take the hint, leave her alone and, please, learn from this experience so you won't repeat it with someone else.

DEAR ABBY: I am 60, and my husband is 64. We lost everything in the recession. A dear friend helped us get back on our feet, and my son and husband built a home on land we purchased with our last dollar. We have a mortgage and all the bills that come with it. We have no savings, pension or life insurance. I work 40 hours a week, and my husband is partially disabled from an autoimmune disease.

My son, who is studying to become an RN, is 33. He lives with us and pays $550 a month, which pays the property taxes. He has slowly brought his girlfriend into our home, whom we like, but she does not contribute financially. I have asked my son for some extra money, and he refused. We will always appreciate how he pitched in and helped us in creating a new home. What can I do without starting a family war? -Keeping The Peace

DEAR KEEPING: It would have been interesting to know what reason your son gave you for his refusal. Continue talking with him about it. Unless the girlfriend is unemployed, she should at least pay for her food and a share of the utilities if she is living in your home.

DEAR READERS: This is National Women's Health Week. Because of the current health crisis, taking care of your health is now more important than ever. Make it a priority. Eat healthy, give yourself the gift of exercise, manage your stress levels, get the sleep you need, and schedule that appointment to see your doctor or dentist as soon as they are seeing patients again. Take steps to eliminate behaviors that put you at risk - smoking, texting while driving and not wearing a seatbelt. Your health is your most precious possession, so please, take care of it. DEAR ABBY: My fiance and I got engaged a few months ago and have been getting mixed messages from our parents about our wedding next year. Overall, they seem happy for us, but they don't show much interest in our relationship, or the wedding either.

Since we are gay, we are unsure whose, if any, parents we should ask to help us pay for the wedding. My fiance's parents are very conservative and most likely wouldn't volunteer to contribute. My parents are likely the only ones who would help, but they haven't made any offers.

We both have full-time jobs, but they are middle to low income, so help would be appreciated. Part of me resents them for not offering any help since their parents pitched in for their festivities and because they will undoubtedly expect invitations. Any advice you can give would be appreciated. - Marrying In The West

DEAR MARRYING: Welcome to the world of gay weddings, a subject that has cropped up since 2015, when it was legalized in all 50 states. There are no hard and fast rules covering this. Modern couples, both straight and gay, often pay for their own weddings to the extent their budgets allow.

While you and your fiance might raise the subject of pitching in with your parents, in the interest of family harmony, please try not to do it with prior resentments or expectations. Whether they agree or decline, you will be fine, and your day will be special.

DEAR ABBY: I was invited to a baby shower. Because of the virus that's going around, many people weren't planning on going, so they canceled the party. Should I still take them the gift I bought for their baby? Or should I just forget it because they canceled the baby shower? - Bearing A Gift In New Mexico DEAR BEARING A GIFT: Do not "just forget it." The kind - and generous - way to handle it would be to give the mother-to-be the gift, remembering that, in spite of the shower being canceled, she will need things for her baby. Dear Abby is written by Abigail Van Buren, also known as Jeanne Phillips, and was founded by her mother, Pauline Phillips. Contact Dear Abby at www.DearAbby.com or P.O. Box 69440, Los Angeles, CA 90069.

What a Christian is

Q: A cable news network recently asked a panel of political and religious leaders what being an evangelical meant and no one could answer. They even

A: Those who identify as Christians often do not fully understand what Christ has done for them. But for those who have surrendered their lives completely to Him, they accept Christ's redeeming work on the cross for mankind.

The word "Christian" actually means "a partisan for Christ." In our political culture the word "partisan" is a word that is understandable. It we are committed to something or someone. Partisans are not neutral. So this is a wonderful way to describe who and what a Christian is.

But many people struggle with this. Some say, "A Christian is a person who prays" or "A Christian lives by the golden rule." But praying or living by the golden rule doesn't make someone a Christian. A person may be sincere, but that doesn't make him or her a Christian.

Being a Christian is serious business! It means to accept Christ as personal Savior and means to take sides. It means obey His Word written in the Bible. It means to deny worldly pleasures and seek to please God in all things. It means to follow Jesus faithfully and joyfully. When Christians falter – and we do – we confess our sin to the Lord and ask Him to strengthen us.

We can never live the Christian life on the highest plane unless we are continually growing and moving forward. We should grow closer to God day by day as we strive to live as a shining light in a godless society and stand up for that which is right, just, and honorable.

Tech stocks keep rallying, help keep Wall Street steady

By STAN CHOE and ALEX VEIGA

AP Business Writers

Wall Street was split on Monday, as continued gains for technology and health care stocks helped cover up for more prevalent losses elsewhere.

The S&P 500 ended the day at a virtual standstill, up just 0.39 points at 2,930.19, despite a lot of movement going on underneath. It rallied back from an earlier loss of 0.9 percent in the morning.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 109.33 points, or 0.4 percent, to 24,221.99, while the Nasdaq composite added 71.02, or 0.8 percent, to 9,192.34.

Through the muddled day, one of the market's few points of clarity was that investors continue to love technology stocks.
